

I believe that television should more accurately represent actual life. Children grow up learning from television. We need to keep this in mind as parents and consumers.

The government regulators (FCC) that were concerned about language used in musical recordings, and are concerned about language used during (predominately) adult oriented shows seem disingenuous in their concern when they let the state of C*PS type shows and the like run rampant.

We should let parents and caretakers monitor the access that children have to violence, but there may be room for pushing this type of content to the late evening. Images of war and violence have a very negative impact on a developing mind. Glorifying war in a time of war, merely to desensitize, or create support for a war is troubling at best, and possibly immoral.

Children absorb images of violence subconsciously, and understandably assume it has an appropriate place in society. I would rather have a child who might offend someone with language that seems inappropriate, than resorting to assault.
